The radicality of surgery in the treatment of primary lung cancer has been an object of many controversies, even in the past decades. This is the result of the variability of the histological types, the lack of uniformity in staging methods and of the possible infiltration of mediastinal lymph nodes, which can modify the therapeutic management. Since 1970 a series of 340 patients underwent surgical treatment for primary lung cancer. Data from clinical, histological and radiological examination were analyzed retrospectively and compared with current international standards. The series is representative of the Lung Cancer Italian Study Group (GIS), with a ratio of stage I = 23.5%, stage II = 59.3% and stage III = 17.2%. Adenocarcinoma and squamous-cell carcinoma were the most frequent types (54% and 24% respectively), while small cell carcinoma and undifferentiated carcinoma were very rare. Only one patient presented with extrathoracic metastases at the time of the diagnosis. The staging was based on the new TNM classification and results in radicality in 89.2% of cases. In the three groups of resectability, we had complete surgical resection in 98.4%, incomplete in 1.5% and no surgery in 0.5% of the cases. This study confirms the high percentage of radicality of surgical treatment of primary lung cancer, even for patients considered inoperable at the beginning. iZettle is the leading European company and the biggest mobile business payments provider in Scandinavia and Estonia.
